Cairo, which is the capital of Egypt, has a population of 1,307,422 (Census 1937) and is by far the largest and most important town in Africa. It is the residence of the King and the seat of the government.

The Beginning of Cairo was a small residential place, which was situated where what is now known as Old Cairo stands. The Greeks called it Babylon, though it had no connection with the more ancient Babylon on the Euphrates. The Romans fortified it and under the Emperor Augustus it became the headquarters of one of the three Roman legions stationed in Egypt. Parts of the walls and two of the bastions of the fortress still remain, the latter adjoining the Coptic Museum, and the Coptic church of El Muallaqa, next to the Museum, is built on the east tower of the south gate of the fortress.

In A. D. 640 Babylon was capture by the Arabs under general Amr, and a new town called El Fustat, and a mosque, the Mosque of Amr, were built close by. Both the town and the original mosque have disappeared, the town having been burnt down about A. D. 750, but another mosque was built on the site of the old one, and still remains, bearing the some name. This has been enlarged and altered several times and is the oldest mosque in Cairo.

The town was never rebuilt, but a new town sprang up on the northeast and was extended from time to time, and slightly to the north of this in A. D. 969, the modern town of Cairo was founded. At the hour when the foundation of the walls was laid, the planet Mars, which the Arrives call El Qahir, of (the victorious), crossed the meridian of the new town, in consequence of which it was named "El Qahir", which has been corrupted to Cairo. The new town was a fortified enclosure containing two palaces government offices, quarters for the garrison, treasury, mint, library, arsenal and other buildings, and until 1171 no person was allowed to enter except the soldiers of the garrison and the highest officers of the state. Three of the original sixty gates of the ancient town still remain, namely the Bab el Naar, the Bab el Futuh and the Bab el Zuwella.

The Bab el Zuwella, which was the southern gate of the town, is mentioned twice in "The Arabian Nights Entertainment's", and is now called the Bab el Mutawelli, after a certain Mohammedan saint, who is supposed to live behind it. and on the gate hang bits of cloth and other votive offerings placed there by sufferers, who still frequent the gate in hope of cure. Persons afflicted with headache drive a nail into the door to take away the pain, and those suffering from toothache extract a tooth and fix it in a crack in the door to ensure their not being attacked again.

The Bab el Nasr, or the gate of "Gate of Victory", and the Bab el Futuh, of "Gate of Conquests", which are close together, formed the north-east extremity of the old fortifications. They each consist of two massive towers, with outer and inner gates, and chambers between, and one can ascend a winding staircase in the east gate-tower of the Bab el Nasr, then walk along the old wall, the el Futuh, beyond which the wall is continued for some distance. The towers and the wall provided a strong position for Napoleon's troops in 1799 and the names of some of his aides-de-camp may still be seen inscribed on the walls.

The Citadel, on account of its age and history, is one of the most important buildings of Cairo, and , because of its commanding position on the Moqattom hills, it is the most prominent. It was begun in 1176 by Sultan Salag el Din, commonly called Saladin, shom King Richard I of England defeated during the Third Crusade at Arsoof near Jaffa in Palestine in 1191. According to the accounts of the Arab historians, the citadel was built with stones taken from the smaller pyramids at Giza. A large part of the original structure remains. Within the citadel enclosure is the alabaster mosque of Mohammed

Ali which was finished in 1867, and restored very recently. From the south-west corner, behind the mosque, a very fine and extensive view of Cairo and the surrounding country may be obtained, and the sunset seen behind the pyramids is particularly beautiful.

A gun on the hill behind the citadel is fired daily at noon by an electric current from the observatory at Helwan.

The well outside the citadel, called Joseph's well and generally attributed to the Biblical Joseph, was probably sunk by Sultan Salah el Din (Saladin) whose name was Jusuf (Joseph), to supply the citadel with water before the aqueduct was built. It is a square shaft with a spiral passage round it, sunk to a depth of 290 feet in the limestone rock. Within the shaft, at a depth of 155 feet, is a platform on which stood a saqiya (water wheel). The saqiya was worked by oxen and brought the water to the surface. The well is not now used.

In connection with the citadel the ancient aqueduct made to supply the fortress with water, may be described. The beginning of it near the river may be seen from the Old Cairo road (Sharia Kasr el Aini road) not far from the turning to the Abbas bridge. It was built by Sultan Mohammed el Nasir in 1311 though formerly ascribed to Salah el Din, and was restored by Sultan el Ghuri (1501-1516).

The most important mosque is that of El Azhar, which was built in 971 and was created a university in 988. It has been much added to and restored from time to time and is the largest and most important Mohammedan university in the world, students coming to it from most Mohammedan countries. In 1926-1927 there were 246 teachers and 4838 students, of whom 700 were non-Egyptian. Instruction is free, and money is also provided for food. The students live at the university.

ccThere are about fifty ancient mosques in Cairo and several hundred altogether, which naturally, cannot all be described, but two prominent ones are those of Sultan Hasah (1356-1363) and El Rifai (completed in 1912) which are situated opposite one another on the road leading up to the citadel from the centre of Cairo. The El Rifai mosque contains the tomb of the Khedive Ismail and that of King Fuad. On Roda island opposite the beginning of Old Cairo, is the Nilometer, or Nile Gauge, erected in 716, which consists of a well with a graduated column in the centre, on which the height of the Nile is measured. It has been restored several times, once quite recently.

The ancient Christian (Coptic) churches are at Old Cairo and include those of El Muallaqa, Abu Sarga, St Barbara and St. Markurius, the two first mentioned being well worth a visit.

What are often called "The Dead Cities", but which should be "The Cities of the Dead", as they are not and never were inhabited, are the mosque-tombs of the Arab rulers of Egypt during the Middle Ages, and they comprise the Tombs of The Caliphs and the Tombs of the Mamelukes, both situated near the citadel, the former to the north and the latter to the south. Some of these have been restored in modern times.

Although, as will be realized from the foregoing not, Cairo dates back about a thousand years, many of the ancient Egyptian remains in the neighbourhood are several times that age. Thus the step pyramid at Sakkarakm which is the oldest large stone monument in the world, is about 5,000 years old as are also the adjoining temples; the large pyramid at Giza, that of Cheops, is about 4,850 years old and the second pyramid that of Chephren and the sphinx about 4,800 years old.

In order to make clear the size of the large pyramid at Giza, a few figures may be given. The pyramid covers an area of about thirteen acres; the original height was about 480 feet, it is estimated that the number of blocks of stone used was about 2,300,000 the average size of each being about forty cubic feet and their weight about two and a half tons. The greater part of the stone used for the pyramid is fossiliferous limestone cut from the plateau on which it stands, and the hollow nearby, where the sphinx is, is the quarry from which the stone was obtained. The pyramid was coated with a much finer quality of limestone, which was brought across the Nile from near Tura and Ma'sara, where the ancient quarries may still be seen. A large amount of coarse-grained red granite from Aswan, some 500 miles away, was used in the interior of the pyramid, especially for lining the burial chamber. The Greek traveler and historian, Herodotus, who visited Egypt in the fifth century B.C., states that all the stone for the pyramid was brought from across the Nile, and in this he was not so wrong as might be thought, since he only saw the outside covering, which did come from the other side of the river, but wince his time, the covering has been largely stripped off for use as building material in Cairo,-- this having been done many hundreds of years later, and Herodotus knew nothing of the inner stones that are now visible.

This pyramid, which contains nothing but an uninscribed and empty red granite sarcophagus, of which the lid is missing, provides an outstanding example of ancient tomb robbery, and there may be seen to-day, not only the robbed and empty sarcophagus, bur also both the proper entrance and, below it, the robbers' hole, which is now used as the entrance.

On the east side, adjoining the pyramid, there was originally a temple, of which nothing now remains except the basalt pavement, over which one walks to teach the sphinx.

The pyramid of Chephren was originally 471 feet high. Part of the casing remains at the top. Inside there is one chamber containing an empty granite sarcophagus, the lid of which is broken. The entrance passage is lined with granite for part of the way. The remains of the temple still exist on the east side.

The third Giza pyramid, that of Mycerinus, is much smaller than the other two. The upper part of the casing was limestone and the lower part, much of which still remains, of red granite. The sarcophagus was lost at sea on its way to England. The remains of the temple are on the east side.

The sphinx is a colossal recumbent lion with the head of Chephren and is of the same age as the second pyramid.

The so-called Temple of the Sphinx was an elaborate entrance to the causeway leading up to the temple and pyramid of Chephren.

The modern village of Mitrahineh marks the site of one of the oldest, most famous and most populous towns of ancient Egypt, and one that was the capital of the country for many centuries, namely Memphis. It attained its greatest prosperity under the pharaohs of the Old Kingdom, but even under the Middle and New Kingdoms, when Thebes became the capital, and the Theban god Amun-Ra superseded Ptah, the great god of Memphis, the old capital still flourished. During the course of the contests for the possession of Egypt, Memphis was captured in 745 B. C. by the Sudanese king Piankhi, whose capital was Napata near the Fourth Nile Cataract, and later, in 661 B. C. by the Assyrians, and still later, in 525 B. C. , by Cambyses the Persian conqueror of Egypt. About 460 B. C. Memphis was again besieged, this time by the Libyans, who revolted from the Persian domination, but was not captured. Even after the Roman occupation of Egypt, which began in 30 B. C., Memphis remained a large and populous city, though its palaces lay ruined and deserted, and a number of temples still existed, including that of Ptah. Now the ruins of this temple, the debris of a palace of Menephtah (1225-1215 B. C.), an alabaster sphinx (18th or 19th Dynasty) and two colossal statues of Ramses II (1292-1225 B. C. are all that remain. The pyramids and tombs of Sakkara are the cemetery of the ancient Memphis.

The step pyramid has already been mentioned. It is about 5,000 years old and is the oldest large stone monument in the world. It was the burial place of the pharaoh Zoser, who built it. A few years ago, in a gallery in this pyramid there were found some 30,000 beautiful stone vases, which have been estimated to weigh about ninety tons. Also, there was found the remains of a six-ply wood coffin, probably that of a daughter of Zoser. The different layers making the thickness of the coffin were pegged together with wooden pegs, the various layers of wood being arranged with the grain of the wood alternately in different directions, in order to prevent warping and to give strength, exactly as is done to-day. At the bottom corners of the coffin, the edges of the five outermost layers were beveled at an angle of 45, that is to say, the joints were mitred, but the innermost layer had square, or butt joints.

The most interesting tombs at Sakkara are of the Fifth Dynasty

(2750-2625 B. C.) and of the Sixth Dynasty (2625-2475 B. C.), the finest work being in those of Ti and Ptahhotep, both Fifth Dynasty, but those of Mera and Kagemna of the Sixth Dynasty, but those of Mera and Kagemna of the sixth Dynasty are equally interesting, though not of the same artistic merit.

The last monument of Sakkara to be mentioned, the Serapeum or the tombs of the sacred bull Apis, belong to a period do much later than the step pyramids and the Old Kingdom tombs, a period of more than 2,000 years, that it is difficult to grasp the fact that the interval between the building of the step pyramid and that of the Serapeum and the present day.

Although the Apis bulls had been buried in the Serapeum as early as the Eighteenth Dynasty (1580-1350 B. C.), it was not until the Twenty-sixth Dynasty (663-525 B. C.) that the huge stone sarcophagi were made, some of the stone having been brought from Aswan, about 500 miles away.

To the north-east of Cairo, near Matariya, are a few ruins and a standing obelisk, which are all that are left of the ancient city of Heliopolis, the famous "city of the sun" called on by the Egyptians. This was one of the most ancient Egyptian cities and for a time long before Memphis was built, was the capital and it remained for centuries the religious and intellectual centre of the country. The Biblical Joseph married a daughter of Potiphara priest of On.

The obelisk, which is in its original position, dates from the reign of Sesostris I (1980-1935 B. C.), the top being originally covered with metal, possibly copper gilt. Two other obelisks from Heliopolis were removed to Alexandria and erected there by the Romans in 23 B. C. One of these, which was given to the British Government by the Khedive Mohammed Ali is, now on the Thames Embankment in London, and the other, given by the Khedive Ismail to New York, is now in the Central Park there.
